

Trump's Xenophobia Will Exacerbate Crisis

---

P progressive.org/op-eds/trump-xenophobia-exacerbate-crisis-fersan-golden-200417

Eliane Fersan, Kai
Golden

April 17,
2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

| The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the “Chinese virus,” refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers, and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president’s inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump’s immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with pre-existing medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump Administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration’s history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Trump’s Attorney General, William Barr, has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky — a staunch ally of the Trump Administration on immigration policy — made the revelatory remark that “taxpayer money shouldn’t go to non-people,” in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as non-human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79 percent surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21 percent increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a two-year-old and a six-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out over-crowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating, and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

© 2017 • The Progressive Inc. • 30 West Mifflin Street, Suite 703 • Madison, Wisconsin 53703
• (608)257-4626

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis | The Sacramento Bee

---

B sacbee.com/news/news-services/article242096401.html

By ELIANE FERSAN AND KAI GOLDEN Tribune News Service

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky – a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy – made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Distributed by Tribune Content Agency, LLC.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

globegazette.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_de73aa8e-b568-5960-8965-5dce0753cf15.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

---

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

 tylerpaper.com/ap/commentary/commentary-trump-s-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_685d9d4d-8306-53c4-9b50-c7bb8bb5c4d4.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden Tribune News Service
(TNS)

April 17,
2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the “Chinese virus,” refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president’s inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump’s immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration’s history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky — a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy — made the revelatory remark that “taxpayer money shouldn’t go to non-people,” in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

-----

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

-----

Distributed by Tribune Content Agency, LLC.

-----

PHOTO (for help with images, contact 312-222-4194):

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

wcfcourier.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_ef681f5a-ddbe-52e6-9437-7427ae49b83f.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

US President Donald J. Trump arrives with Vice President Mike Pence for the Coronavirus Task Force briefing to deliver remarks on the COVID-19 pandemic in the Rose Garden at the White House in Washington, DC on April 15, 2020. (Pool/Abaca Press/TNS)

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

—

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

HR herald-review.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_8396ff40-94a5-56c8-9d51-8f703c085f97.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

---

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

 journaltimes.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_ee63e71c-638a-5d0e-9f9d-f004e7206314.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

---

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

 billingsgazette.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_27d4963f-52b9-5257-a17a-8081dac697bd.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17,
2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

---

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

trib.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_4dbcbd9f-2df0-598d-9d32-c9b71350e33a.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

—

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

 madison.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article-8c8ac7fd-466f-5949-8075-d35519da16cc.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

---

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

 arcamax.com/politics/opeds/s-2352266

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky -- a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy -- made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than

1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

About The Writers

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Distributed by Tribune Content Agency, LLC.

©2020 ArcaMax Publishing. All rights reserved

Advertise | Privacy Policy | Terms of Use | Help/FAQ's | Unsubscribe | Do Not Sell My Personal Information

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

tucson.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_d37a7df1-2110-5e77-a0e5-7d86b5d35633.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

US President Donald J. Trump arrives with Vice President Mike Pence for the Coronavirus Task Force briefing to deliver remarks on the COVID-19 pandemic in the Rose Garden at the White House in Washington, DC on April 15, 2020. (Pool/Abaca Press/TNS)

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

—

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

 omaha.com/news/national/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_b46ba86d-8d41-5381-93bd-42d6bdae298a.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

—

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

 missoulian.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_ee539e3d-d23c-5a0e-9874-78af64c8cdc4.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

---

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

gazettetimes.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_e4fc41df-38e9-55b9-be4f-a16eb892e4c7.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

President Donald Trump participates in a news briefing with members of the Coronavirus Task Force at the White House in Washington, D.C., on Thursday, April 16, 2020. (Chris Kleponis/Pool/Sipa USA/TNS)

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

---

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

 pressofatlanticcity.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_cfe0e702-83a5-5884-9bba-827507871d4f.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

—

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

R napavalleyregister.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_dd60854b-14fa-5ba5-b0b3-4717722111f7.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

Dr. Anthony Fauci participates in a news briefing with members of the Coronavirus Task Force at the White House in Washington, D.C., on Thursday, April 16, 2020. (Chris Kleponis/Pool/Abaca Press/TNS)

Pool/ABACA PRESS/TNS

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

—

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

0 comments

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

wiscnews.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_23519f82-b9ac-5a2d-8d49-adce1a5a0cc0.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

President Donald Trump participates in a news briefing with members of the Coronavirus Task Force at the White House in Washington, D.C., on Thursday, April 16, 2020. (Chris Kleponis/Pool/Abaca Press/TNS)

Infographic about the White House plan to reopen the country. Tribune News Service 2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

—

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

C. auburnpub.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_6ad84522-2c0f-5c62-b5c2-6854bad7073c.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

Dr. Deborah Birx participates in a news briefing with members of the Coronavirus Task Force at the White House in Washington, D.C., on Thursday, April 16, 2020. (Chris Kleponis/Pool/Abaca Press/TNS)

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

—

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

 bozemandailychronicle.com/ap\_news/commentary-trump-s-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_e89df85b-0f8b-5459-8e4e-91570b826839.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden Tribune News Service
(TNS)

April 17,
2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the “Chinese virus,” refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president’s inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump’s immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration’s history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky — a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy — made the revelatory remark that “taxpayer money shouldn’t go to non-people,” in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

-----

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

-----

Distributed by Tribune Content Agency, LLC.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

DJ dailyjournalonline.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_faaffddd-e3fb-5c98-bb6d-6dde6c0a0f79.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

—

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

 elkoday.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_797a552f-3392-5a7e-b4ab-99f042e25e8c.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

---

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

 fredericksburg.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_b1ff11e1-a269-5867-b103-7c7dca471b02.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

—

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

K kdhnews.com/news/ap/commentary-trump-s-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_42ca9f25-fc4f-5c67-940a-43982a04532c.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden Tribune News Service
(TNS)

April 17,
2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the “Chinese virus,” refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president’s inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump’s immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration’s history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky — a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy — made the revelatory remark that “taxpayer money shouldn’t go to non-people,” in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

-----

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

-----

Distributed by Tribune Content Agency, LLC.

-----

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

KN kenoshanews.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_57e4558a-9b17-5068-a644-665212101360.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

---

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

m.chippewa.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_aba31d87-e100-553c-b7fc-a4e0660c70e6.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

President Donald Trump participates in a news briefing with members of the Coronavirus Task Force at the White House in Washington, D.C., on Thursday, April 16, 2020. (Chris Kleponis/Pool/Sipa USA/TNS)

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

—

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

★ poststar.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_436f6f44-3979-5c3a-bb8c-15370158a523.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

US President Donald J. Trump arrives with Vice President Mike Pence for the Coronavirus Task Force briefing to deliver remarks on the COVID-19 pandemic in the Rose Garden at the White House in Washington, DC on April 15, 2020. (Pool/Abaca Press/TNS)

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

—

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

 qctimes.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_bcdcd9e9-94ec-5a07-8b1c-a9390dfc6e9f.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

—

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Commentary: Trump's xenophobia will exacerbate crisis

---

scj siouxcityjournal.com/opinion/columnists/commentary-trumps-xenophobia-will-exacerbate-crisis/article\_324db3f1-14ce-52fe-a2b6-bebec4006e44.html

By Eliane Fersan and Kai Golden, Tribune News Service

April 17, 2020

At a time when COVID-19 is making global solidarity and cooperation more important than ever, President Donald Trump is instead continuing to push a divisive and nationalistic agenda.

He has contradicted guidance from health experts, called COVID-19 the "Chinese virus," refused to alleviate the density inside migrant detention centers and implemented unnecessary, draconian restrictions along the southern border. No longer simple political jockeying, the president's inability to abandon racially divisive statements and actions will inflame our public health crisis.

Trump's immigration system has repeatedly ignored its own recommendations to slow the spread of COVID-19 among detainees, risking the lives of thousands. Since detainees cannot practice social distancing, the chances of an outbreak are high, which will threaten those with preexisting medical conditions as well as workers traveling in and out of the facilities.

The Trump administration also continues to force thousands of immigrants and their legal advocates to attend crowded courtrooms and file in-person motions, endangering those attempting to comply. This is consistent with the administration's history of efforts to hamper pathways for legal immigration by any means necessary.

Attorney General William Barr has asked Congress to craft legislation allowing the Department of Justice to suspend certain constitutional rights, specifically by giving chief judges the power to detain people indefinitely. This will only cram more vulnerable detainees together, out of reach of the health care system.

In March, Republican Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky - a staunch ally of the Trump administration on immigration policy - made the revelatory remark that "taxpayer money shouldn't go to non-people," in reference to undocumented immigrants. Beyond categorizing immigrants as not human, his statement falsely inferred that undocumented immigrants pay no taxes.

Meanwhile, Trump has shut down the border to immigrants on public health grounds, despite the U.S. having more COVID-19 cases than Mexico and all of Central America combined.

It would not be the first time in Trump's presidency, much less American history, that the president problematized a crisis across ethno-nationalist lines. During WWII, FDR interned some 120,000 Japanese Americans. Following 9/11, George W. Bush detained more than 1,000 Muslims without cause and quietly deported thousands of others. What followed was a surge in violence against Muslims and Americans of perceived "Arabness."

In 2016, Trump's xenophobic rhetoric against Muslims and Latinos led to a 79% surge in anti-Muslim harassment and a 21% increase in anti-Latino hate crimes, according to the FBI.

Academics believe Trump's repeated use of the phrase "Chinese virus" has helped spur an increase in reported anti-Asian hate incidents such as the recent stabbing of three Asian shoppers, including a 2-year-old and a 6-year-old, at a Sam's Club in Midland, Texas.

Trump has repeatedly chosen opportunism over public health, but crises should not be used for promoting restrictionist policies against immigrants.

Instead, U.S. officials should shut down immigration courts and thin out overcrowded detention centers, denounce scapegoating and promote a message of unity and support so citizens are encouraged to help each other through the crisis rather than pass blame.

The coronavirus pays no mind to citizenship status. Neither should public health.

—

ABOUT THE WRITERS

Eliane "Elle" Fersan (@ellefersan) is the director, the Immigrants and Global Migration Initiative at the Gould School of Law, University of Southern California. Kai Golden is a research fellow with IGMI. This column was produced for the Progressive Media Project, which is operated by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.